Teacher Uses Cookies and Toothpicks to Educate Students

Fourth graders at J.E.B. Stuart Elementary school were given the opportunity to take on the role of an archaeologist. Students had to first provide their teacher, Mrs. Williams, with facts about an archaeologist such as what they do, what type of tools they use and why they play a significant role in learning about the past. Once students shared their information with Mrs. Williams, she provided them with the site for their archaeological dig (M & M Cookies) and their tools (toothpicks). Mrs. Williams shared with the students that as archaeologists they must work cautiously and carefully so they do not damage the artifacts that they find. The teacher then challenged her students to remove the M & M's from the cookies without breaking the cookie. Students could only use their tools (the toothpicks).
